Two New Members*

RALEIGH: Today, Gov. Roy Cooper announced that nearly $20 million in Clean Water Management Trust Fund grants have been awarded to help fund 50 projects that will conserve lands and protect waterways serving millions of North Carolinians.

“The Clean Water Management Trust Fund plays a vital role in protecting North Carolina’s most treasured natural and cultural resources for future generations,” said Governor Roy Cooper. “Since the fund’s beginning, these grants have been used in every North Carolina county to protect drinking water supplies, preserve historical resources, conserve clean streams for fishing and swimming, and provide buffers around our military bases.”

The new grants awarded last week will be used to protect 10,286 acres, including western waterfalls, maritime forests, historic forts, greenways and trails and buffers around military bases. Over 8,200 acres will be open to the public for hiking, birding and other recreational uses. Funds were also granted for 10 projects to restore over 13 miles of the state’s waterways and 5 projects designed to introduce innovative techniques for managing stormwater. Grants awarded this week will help protect 135 species of rare plants and animals.

Over the last 20 years, the Clean Water Management Trust Fund has conserved over 500,000 acres of land, protected more than 2,500 miles of streambank, and preserved 12 historic sites.

“Protecting the state’s natural and cultural resources is critical to the economic sustainability of our state, helping to make North Carolina an attractive place to live, work and visit,” said Susi H. Hamilton, secretary of the Department of Natural and Cultural Resources.
